Why Learn to Build a Business Case?

Investing company resources in a new telecom project or IT system requires an estimate of the costs and benefits. Your CTO, CFO or CEO will need to be persuaded by your proposal; knowing how to construct a business case is the answer.

Not everyone has had training or has a financial background in building business cases.

This course will help you get ahead in your career, and help the company you work for.

The course covers all aspects of building a robust business case.

Behind The Figures

An understanding of the key trigger points and possible issues that may arise in building a business case.

Building a business case for an investment—or at least knowing what needs to go into one—is primary knowledge for a successful career in any business.

Few people really understand the essentials or have the opportunity to learn these necessary skills. This course takes participants through the basic components of a business case and financial analysis.

A Business Case for a Telecoms Project

This module, which is delivered as a mix of lectures, breakouts and role play, will simulate the business case for a telecoms project.

Participants will learn how to structure a business case—the information that is typically sought, alternative scenarios to consider and how to present succinct recommendations to the decision panel.

Topics also cover how to develop a financial model, use discounted cash-flow techniques and extract key financial indicators in support of the business case and recommendations.

The sessions will involve hands-on breakout workshops with role play. Each team will develop a business case for a given investment scenario and present it to a panel of financial experts for critical appraisal.

(The head of an investment venture team will also be present.)
